Born in 1954 and grown up in Japan, I read geography and mathematics at two Japanese universities. Although I didn't use these qualifications for career, these two subjects are symbolic of my preferred thinking and viewing ways: horizontal and vertical, human and abstract. As a student, I read a book written by Master Masahiro Oki, one of the most famous Japanese yogis. He was an idiosyncratic teacher-healer-philosopher and the originator of a very individual system of yoga, known as Okido Yoga, 'Yoga in Oki's way'. After completing profound disciplines in many fields, he had founded the International Oki Yoga Institute (We call it as Mishima Dojo) in Mishima, Japan, in 1967. I started attending this place in 1978.

Then, after graduation and a period of teaching at high schools, I entered a residential apprenticeship under Oki Sensei and studied yoga there 1980 – 1984, with many colleagues. Oki Sensei used to say 'Eating from the same pot is the base line of Okido Yoga.' It is so true because I still feel the brother/sisterhood with those who I thus shared time together with and have not seen for 30 years, no matter how different everybody's personality is. When I studied in Mishima Dojo, it was a residential place under a nonstop service system. There was no structural syllabus in this learning style.

I attended lessons and lectures given by Oki Sensei, senior staff and occasional guest teachers. I also learned by assisting their lessons and working together with senior and junior staff members. For his students to develop wider views, Oki Sensei invited many guest teachers, some of whom were internationally well-known including B.K.S. Iyengar of Yoga, Nathmal Tatia of Jaina Philosophy, and masters of Japanese Do-arts.

Then Oki Sensei suggested to me that I should work for a newly-founded Okido Yoga charitable company in the UK. So I came over to the UK in May 1984 and ever since I have been teaching Okido Yoga under the charitable organisation, Okido Natural Health Education Trust Ltd. Except for 10 years (1988-1998) when my husband worked together with me, I have been the sole resident teacher for this organisation. I have raised four children during this period. I am also a certified teacher of the British Wheel of Yoga, the largest yoga membership organisation in the UK.
